External intelligence check: University warns banks about student accounts used as mone

Team,

The article titled "University warns banks about student accounts used as money mule routes" has been circulated to Financial Crime.

Please do not search for a few matching words and call it a case. I want to know whether the reported behaviour has a measurable footprint in our own November data, what an innocent explanation would look like, and which evidence we do not have.

Start with transaction chronology, account age and status, channel changes, ATM attempts, linked beneficiaries and customer contacts. Where correspondent-payment files exist, include routing and settlement exceptions.

The output should be a restricted case list with a comparison group and reasons both for and against escalation. No customer is to be described as fraudulent because they resemble a news story.
