Follow-up: who needs an explanation before the next rate change?

Hi all,

I may be joining dots that do not belong together, so please challenge the premise.

Loan Products needs to identify borrowers most exposed to repricing and the questions customers are likely to raise. Failure anecdotes are beginning to drive decisions, although retries and late posting may be making the problem look larger than the affected-customer population.

Could the answer be that clear communication reduces avoidable complaints? Or are we actually seeing that thin affordability buffers matter more than loan size? I also do not want us to miss the possibility that variable-rate customers show higher payment pressure.

This has returned because the previous answer was useful but not strong enough to become a standing rule. Use June 2022 as the new evidence point rather than recycling the earlier conclusion. The practical decision is which customers need proactive communication and which product assumptions need review. Please send a short decision pack with no more than five slides and an attached evidence table; I need the exceptions and counter-examples, not only an average.

Work from the latest closed loan files available by the request date, including affordability, pricing and origination risk fields; collections cases, promises to pay and recovery payments; customer contacts, complaints and suggestions; transaction-level timestamps, channels, amounts, statuses and error context. Use recorded loan rates and behaviour; do not infer contractual repricing terms not present in the data.

Regards
