The active-account number may be flattering us - 2025 control review

Hi,

This came up in a working session and nobody had the same definition.

The board keeps using active accounts as a proxy for customer primacy, and that assumption needs to be challenged.

I do not want a dashboard that simply counts the outcome. Start with the competing explanations: regular inflows and recurring payments indicate a primary relationship; fee or service friction precedes the drop in activity; or customers keep the account open but move useful activity elsewhere.

The discussion is currently being driven by anecdotes, and the teams involved are describing the same customers differently. This has returned because the previous answer was useful but not strong enough to become a standing rule. Use January 2025 as the new evidence point rather than recycling the earlier conclusion.

What we need to decide is how Keystone should define a primary customer and which customers need service recovery rather than marketing. Please bring a control view with the exceptions, owner and reason each item was included, including a few cases we can trace from source to conclusion.

The available evidence is monthly account snapshots, status events, limits, product enrolments and signatories; transaction-level timestamps, channels, amounts, statuses and error context; debit-order mandates, collection dates, suspensions and cancellations; customer contacts, complaints and suggestions. Use transaction behaviour as a proxy. Do not claim to observe activity held at another bank.

Thank you
