

University warns banks about student accounts used as money mule routes

By Staff Reporter | 14 November 2021

University Financial Aid Office said it had referred a small cluster of suspected retail-banking fraud cases to industry investigators after names surfaced across separate applications and transaction reviews.

People familiar with the referral said Mark Brown and Thabo Nkosi appeared in case notes shared with participating financial institutions. The concern centred on incoming third-party deposits followed by fast outbound transfers, although investigators cautioned that banks would need to confirm the pattern against their own account and transaction records.

One investigator said the matter was useful because it did not look like a single obvious fraud event. "The signals sit across onboarding, device behaviour, payment velocity and customer contact history. No one table tells the full story," the person said.

The referral is expected to increase pressure on banks to improve internal fraud typologies, evidence packs and exception dashboards for operational teams.